and obstinate k. occupying the middle zone of the cornea and usually extending entirely across it. It begins as an opacity on both nasal and temporal sides of the cornea. [F.]—Granular k. See PANNUS.—Herpetic k. See HERPES corneæ (1st def.). A destructive k. characterized by a tendency to the formation of pus in the anterior chamber and infiltration of the corneal tissue, with necrosis of this tissue and slough of the cornea. It is usually accompanied by iritis and is more apt to occur in elderly persons or in broken-down constitutions. [F.]—Hypopyon k. K. ulceroosa complicated with the presence of pus in the anterior chamber. [Berry (a, 29).]—Interstitial k. Lat., k. interstitialis. Fr., kératite interstitielle. A parenchymatous infiltration of the cornea, accompanied by the development of large blisters on its surface, which shake on motion of the eye, showing that they are not entirely filled with fluid. These blisters develop very rapidly and may rupture, or their contents be reabsorbed, and they tend to relapse, and do not yield to treatment. [F.; "N. Y. Med. Jour.," Aug. 25, 1888, p. 212.]—K. contagiosa. A form of suppurative k. observed in cattle which slowly extends through an entire herd. A micro-organism has been found in the tissues. ["Am. Vet. Rev.," Apr., 1889, p. 23 (a, 29).]—K. dendritica exulcerans mycotica. Fr., kératite dendritique ulcéreuse de nature mycotique. K. which begins as a small superficial ulcer and extends in a dendritic or branching form close under the surface of the cornea, making a figure resembling a twig of a tree. The lines are white and the epithelium is shed, leaving ulcerated furrows. [F, 25 (a, 29).]—K. e lagophthalmo. A form of k. occurring in lagophthalmus and due to desiccation of the cornea. It is characterized by a great tendency to a kind of ramifying superficial extension. It is chronic, and the infiltration about the ulcerated lines is so slight as to render the peculiarity of its propagation apt to escape detection, unless on examination with oblique illumination. The pain is slight, but there is some discomfort and photophobia. [Berry (a, 29).]—K. neuropalytica. Fr., kératite neuro-paralytique. Ger., neuropalytische Hornhautentzündung. The cornea becomes opaque, ulcers may form, and supuration may take place, leading to hypopyon, perforation, and iritis. The epithelium of the cornea and that of the conjunctiva become rough and dry. If the fifth nerve is only partially paralyzed, the cornea is but rarely affected. The affection of the cornea is due to mechanical violence from external irritants, the presence of which it does not feel; to desiccation of the cornea, or most probably to atrophic disturbance due to severance from the trophic centres. [B; F.]—K. of reapers. Fr., kératite des moissonneurs. A form of traumatic k. induced by the contact of the beards of grain with the corneæ of reapers. [a, 29].—K. pannosa. A parenchymatous k. in which the opacity is usually so extensive as to give the cornea the appearance, in whole or in part, of ground glass. It may occur in one eye, but is usually bilateral. The symptoms vary greatly in intensity; there may be no vessels visible and but little circumcorneal injection, or there may be very marked symptooms of inflammation. When occurring in connection with Hutchinson's teeth, it is usually regarded as symptomatic of congenital syphilis. It may occur in early childhood or at the period of puberty, or later, or it may be intra-uterine. [F.]—K. phlyctenulosa. Fr., kératite phlycténulaire. Ger., phlyctenulöse Hornhautentzündung. A superficial k. characterized by the appearance of limited, round, sharply defined, superficial gray opacities, which sometimes have a spherical or pointed prominence. [F.]—K. post-variolosa. See K. variolosa.—K. profunda. Fr., kératite profonde. Ger., tiefe Hornhautentzündung. K. involving the deeper layers of the cornea, or the corneal substance proper, usually idiopathic, though it may be traumatic, and accompanied by ciliary injection, lachrymation, photophobia, more or less pain, and an infiltration in the corneal tissue which renders it opaque. There may also, though rarely, be a development of blood-vessels. There are three forms, characterized by ulcers, infiltration, and abscess. By some this term is restricted to the deep non-suppurative form of k. [B; F.]—K. punctata. Fr., kératite ponctuée (ou en points). Ger., punktförmige Hornhauttrübung. A form of k. observed by Mauthner in syphilitic patients, consisting in circumscribed grayish spots as large as a pin's head, which appear in the corneal tissue at different depths, and are perhaps the cells of gummy nodules. The iris is not involved. [Mauthner (F.)]—K. punctata superficialis. An inflammation of the superficial layer of the cornea characterized by minute gray spots which are often arranged in groups or rows as in herpes corneae. [Wien. klin. Woch. Oct. 31, 1889, p. 837 (a, 29).]—K. purulenta. See K. suppurativa.—K. pustulosa. See K. phlyctenulosa.—K. rheumatica. Fr., kératite rhumatismale (ou rhumatique). [B; F.]—K. tennulosa. Phlyctenular k. [B.]—K. traumatica. Fr., kératite traumatique. Ger., traumatische Hornhautentzündung. K. produced by injury. A peculiar corneal ulceration, preceded by xerosis of the conjunctiva and often by hemeralopia. The conjunctiva is dry and covered with a fine froth and scales. The sensibility of the cornea is diminished, and a small, usually central, portion becomes gray. The immediate cause seems to be dryness of the surface of the cornea from incomplete closure of the lids, the palpebral fissure remaining partly open as the result of general weakness. [Schmidt-Rimpfer (a, 29).]—Marginal k. Fr., kératite marginale. Ger., randständige Hornhautentzündung. A phlyctenular form of k. occurring on the limbus. In performing it the observer stations himself at a distance of 1 metre from the patient, and throws a beam of light upon the eye to be examined with a concave mirror which rotates slowly on its axis. As he does so, a shadow moves out from the edge of the pupil and across the field of the latter. He then places convex or concave glasses before the eye until the movement of the shadow takes place in the reverse direction. The glass which accomplishes this reversal, less 1 dioptré if it is a convex glass, or plus 1 dioptré if it is a concave glass, is a measure of the ametropia. This method is independent of the refraction of the observer's eye. [B.]

It., chermes mineralis. Sp., quermes mineral. A substance consisting chiefly of the trisulphide and trioxide of antimony, in varying proportions, together with a small proportion of water and of various adventitious ingredients. It occurs under two forms. One, the kermès par voie humide of the Fr. Cod. (the oxysulphuret of antimony of the U. S. Ph. of 1870.) is a velvety-brown powder, devoid of taste and odor, insoluble in water, prepared by boiling in 640 parts of water, 64 parts of sodium carbonate, and 3 parts of pure antimony trisulphide, and filtering, and drying the precipitate. It consists chiefly of antimony trisulphide and antimony trioxide, in the proportion of 7 parts of the former to 3 of the latter. The kermès par voie sèche of the Fr. Cod., k. igne paratum, is made by fusing a mixture of antimony trisulphide, sulphur, and potassium carbonate. It differs from the first preparation in being coarser, less velvety, and of a redder hue, and in containing impurities, especially arsenic. It is directed to be used in veterinary practice only. KETONE, n. $\text{Ke}^2\text{t}'\text{on}$. Fr., kétone. Ger., Keton. An oxidation product of a secondary alcohol, thus bearing the same relation to the latter that an aldehyde does to a primary alcohol. The k's are derived from the series of bivalent hydrocarbons by the combination of the latter with one atom of oxygen which is united directly with a carbon atom that is itself in direct combination with two other carbon atoms. Or a k. may be regarded as a compound of carboxyl (CO) with two univalent hydrocarbons. The general formula for the k's is, accordingly, $\text{C}_n\text{H}_{2n+1}\text{-C:O-C}_m\text{H}_{2m+1}$. A k. is often designated by the names of the two univalent hydrocarbons which unite thus with carboxyl to form it, prefixed to the term k.; thus methyl ethyl k. is $\text{CH}_3\text{-CO-C}_2\text{H}_5$. [B, 4.]—Aromatic k. A k. derived from a secondary alcohol of the aromatic series, $\text{C}_n\text{H}_{2n-7}\text{-C:O-C}_m\text{H}_{2m+1}$; i. e., a univalent hydrocarbon of the fatty series (methyl or one of its homologues) united with a univalent hydrocarbon of the aromatic series (phenyl or one of its homologues), with the intervention of the radicle carboxyl (CO). A genus of plants formerly including most of the laurels, but now limited to two species having (Bentham and Hooker) the following characters: Flowers polygamous, usually 4 in the involucre; segments of the perianth, 4; stamens, 12 to 20, rarely fewer. The laurels (Lat., Lauracæ [Lindley], Fr., lauracées; Lauri [Jussieu], Fr., lauriers; Laurinæ [Ventenat]; Laurinæ [Jussieu], Fr., laurinées; Ger., Laurineen) are a highly important order of aromatic plants of the Daphnoides, distinguished (Ballou) by the following characters: The absence of stipules, the regularity of the flowers, the concavity of the receptacle, the double perianth, the valvular dehiscence of the anthers, the single anatropal descending ovule, the indehiscent monospermous fruit, and the absence of albumen in the matured seed. The laurels of Meissner include (1) the true laurels (Fr., laurinées vraies), shrubs or trees with the fruit usually superior and the cotyledons plano-convex, as in the genera Cinnamomum, Camphora, etc.; (2) the Cassytheæ (Cassytha); and (3) the Gyrocarpææ, shrubs or trees with the ovary inferior and the cotyledons spiral, as in Illigera, etc. By Ballou the laurels are made to comprise the Cinnamomeæ (13 genera), Cryptocaryeæ (12 genera), Cocotæ (12 genera), Tetrantherææ (10 genera), Cassytheæ (1 genus), Gyrocarpææ (2 genera), Illigereæ (1 genus), and Hernandiææ (1 genus). Bentham and Hooker reject the Gyrocarpææ and Illigereææ from the order, which, according to them, contains 34 genera arranged in the following tribes: Perseeææ (containing 23 genera, Persea, Nectandra, etc.), Litsæææ (containing 9 genera, L., Sassafras, etc.), Cassytheææ (Cassytha), and Hernandiæææ (Hernandia). The Laurææ (Fr., laurées) of Reichenbach are a division of the Laurinææ. The Lavroideææ of Pax are a suborder of the Lauracæææ, comprising genera with bilocular anthers, and including the Apolloniæææ, Cryptocaryeæææ, Acroclidiellæææ, Laurææææ, and Cassytheæææ. LECTITHIN, n. Le²s²i²thj²n. From λέκθος, the yolk of an egg. Fr., lecthine. Ger., L. A term for a class of bodies, C₂₇H₅₃(CmH₂O₂)(C₆H₄O₂)O(OH)₂.C₂H₄N.(CH₃)₃, derived from the tissues of the brain and nerves, from amniotic fluid, from yolk of egg, from bile, from spermatozooids, and from certain vegetable substances. All are derivatives of glycerin, formed by the substitution of the molecules of 2 fatty-acid radicles for 2 molecules of hydroxyl, while the third molecule of hydroxyl is replaced by a molecule of neurine in combination with phosphoric acid. According to some authorities, the neurine in these compounds loses the elements of water before combining with phosphoric acid, and the formula will therefore be C₂₇H₅₃(CmH₂O₂)(C₆H₄O₂)OPO(O₂.C₂H₄.N)(CH₃)₃. The l. obtained from the brain is by some authors said to be distearyl-l., C₂₇H₅₃(C₁₈H₃₅O₂)₂OPO(C₂H₅.N₃)₃=C₄₄H₈₀NPO₂, and by others said to be palmityl-oleyl-l., C₂₇H₅₃(C₁₆H₃₁O₂)(C₁₈H₃₃O₂)₂OPO(C₂H₅.N₃)₃=C₄₂H₇₈NPO₂, or, according to Strecker, C₄₂H₇₈NPO₂. The latter formula corresponds more nearly to the results of analysis. The body is a hygroscopic, white solid of waxy consistence, soluble in alcohol, from which it crystallizes in acicular clusters, and insoluble in water. [B.]

A chronic constitutional disease, endemic in many regions of the world, and due to infection (usually acquired by prolonged intercourse with an affected person) with Bacillus lepræ, beginning with vague premonitory symptoms of malaise, fever, and debility. The development of the disease is usually insidious, and its course is protracted often for many years. It is characterized by the formation of diffuse or nodular infiltrations with other trophic changes in various tissues of the body, and especially by the appearance of erythematous, macular, tubercular, ulcerative, and atrophic lesions in the skin, together with more or less derangement of the cutaneous sensibility. The disease tends to a condition of extreme marasmus and to an almost invariably fatal termination, often precipitated by profuse diarrhoea. Two forms of the disease are usually described—viz., cutaneous or tubercular l. and nervous or anæsthetic l.—though both forms are not infrequently associated in the same subject. At first there are hyperæsthesia and pain; subsequently there is complete loss of sensibility in various regions of the body, especially in circumscribed areas of the skin; sometimes paralysis of muscles and various trophic changes of the tissues develop. It is also attended by bullous (see Pemphigus leprosus) and macular or atrophic (see Macular l.) eruptions, and also by ulceration and gangrene, often attended with mutilation (see Lepra mutilans).—Articular l. See LEPROA mutilans.—Black l. Lat., lepra nigricans (seu maculosa nigra, seu melas, seu umbrosa), melas, morphea nigra, ophiatis sordida, vittiligo melas (seu nigra). They are commonly associated with more or less impairment of sensibility within the areas of discoloration. [G.]—Maculo-anæsthetic l. Fr., lépre maculo-anæsthésique. Syn.: l. ruber planus, l. planus Wilsonii, dermatitis circumscripta herpétiformis [Neumann]. A papular or papulo-squamous chronic or subacute disease of the skin, attended with pruritus. The papules usually occur in circumscribed patches, sometimes in linear or curvilinear figures, situated most commonly about the joints of the extremities, often occurring symmetrically and occasionally becoming general over the body. They vary in size from milium to lenticular, are of a brownish-red or purplish color, are flattened at the top, where the surface appears smooth and glistening with a slight appearance of umbilication, while at the base they often show an angular outline. Often there is a little adherent scale at the summit of the papule, and when a number of papules in a group become confluent the surface of the patch feels rough, hard, and horny (l. planus corneus). On disappearing, the papules leave dark-colored pigment stains and slight atrophic depressions. [G.] Cf. L. ruber acuminatus.—L. planus annulatus. L. planus annulatus pruriginosus [Vidal]. Ger., rothe Schwindflechte. Syn.: l. acuminatus, l. exudativus ruber, l. psoriasis. A chronic cutaneous papulo-squamous disease usually associated with constitutional disturbance that may tend to a grave or even fatal form of marasmus. The eruption consists of hard, red, conical, milium papules, each surmounted by an adherent crust or scale, and attended with itching. The papules gradually multiply till by aggregation the surface involved becomes uniformly covered by a rough, thick, horny crust, or else appears red, thickened, and deeply seamed. Beginning usually upon the trunk, the eruption tends to involve the entire cutaneous surface, though it may affect only certain isolated regions. The papules often occur in a linear arrangement along the natural lines of the skin, where they produce ridge-like elevations which, when the efflorescences are of unusual size, may resemble strings of beads (l. moniliformis). By some the disease is regarded as of identical nature with l. planus. [G.]—L. ruber moniliformis. See L. ruber acuminatus.—L. ruber planus. See L. planus.—L. ruber universalis. LICHENES (Lat.), n. m. pl. Li(le)-ken(ch²an)'ez(e²s). From λεχην, a tree-moss. Fr., lichens. Ger., Flechten. 1. The lichens; a large order of perennial cryptogams, small in size, very variable in color, deriving their nourishment chiefly from the atmosphere, rarely green in color, consisting of a vegetative portion (see THALLES) upon which the reproductive organs (see APOTHECIA, SPERMOGONES, and PYCNIDIA) are borne. By the earlier authors L. were regarded as terrestrial Algae, while some modern authors have classed them with ascomycetous Fungi, from both of which they are distinguished not only by their slow development and long endurance, but by producing in their substance gonidia (g. v.), which under certain conditions are reproductive. Schwendener regards the L. as composite organisms consisting of Algae and Fungi living together as host and parasite. The L. have been variously divided, according to the importance attached by the authors to the vegetative or reproductive organs. Nylander, the leading lichenist, considering the combined characters of the thallus, apothecia, and spermogones, arranges the L. into three groups: Collema, Myriangiacei, and Lichenacei. L. were once extensively used in medicine as demulcents, febrifuges, etc., and some were considered specific in certain diseases. It is said that no poisonous species is known. [B, 1, 19, 121, 170, 173, 180, 291 (a, 35).] 2. See LICHEN (2d def.).—L. angeio-carpi. See ANGEOCARPI (2d def.).—L. disciferi. LIME, n. Lim. A.-S., lim, l. Lat., calx, calcaria. Fr., chaux. Ger., Kalk. It., calce. Sp., cal. A substance obtained by calcining certain minerals (such as limestone) which consist essentially of calcium carbonate. The latter is decomposed by the heat into gaseous carbon dioxide and calcium monoxide, or quick-l. This is a white mass, usually amorphous, but also obtainable in crystals, having a great affinity for carbon dioxide and for water, and converted by contact with the latter into calcium hydroxide, or slaked l. On account of its affinity for water and the heat evolved in its combination with the latter, it exerts a caustic action when brought into contact with living tissues. It is not fusible at any temperature yet attained, but when heated to incandescence gives an intense white light. [B, 3.] For the various salts of lime not here mentioned, see under CALCIUM and CALX.—Anhydrous l. Quick-l.—Bromide of l. A substance formed by the action of bromine on milk of l., analogous in constitution to chloride of l. cin (q. v.). It is aromatic and stimulant, is considered styptic, and is often substituted for the balsams of Peru and Tolu, as well as for liquid storax, with which it has been confounded by many authors. The term I. is sometimes applied to the products of L. orientale and L. attingiana. This has been erroneously identified with balsam of Peru. In Burmah the tree yields two varieties of the balsam—one yellowish and pellucid, obtained by incision, and the other dark and opaque and having a terebinthinous odor, obtained by boring the stem and applying fire around the trunk. [B. 5, 18, 173, 180, 496 (a, 35).]—Liquidambar copal (Fr.). See Liquidambar styraciflua.—Liquidambar du Levant (Fr.). See Liquidambar orientale.—Liquidambra formosana. Ger., amerikanischer (oder virginischer, oder mexicanischer) Amberbaum, Guldenbaum. The bark is said to be an efficient remedy in summer diarrhoea and dysentery, especially in children. The leaves and capsules have an aromatic odor when bruised, and, according to Procter, are acid to the taste and to litmus. The tincture of the fresh leaves is acid and astringent. In warm latitudes the tree yields by incision l. (q. v. [2d def.]). Another product, thicker and darker than l., and resembling liquid storax in properties, is said to be obtained by boiling the young branches in water and skimming off the fluid which rises to the surface; in Texas this resin is used for coughs. LIVER, n. Li²v⁰u²r. A.-S., lifer, lifre. Gr., ἥπαρ. Lat., hepar, jecur. Fr., foie. Ger., Leber. It., segato. Sp., higado. 1. A glandular organ having for its chief functions the secretion of bile and glycogen and to impress upon the blood passing through it certain ill-understood changes. In man it is the largest of the glands, and is situated in the abdomen, on the right side, immediately beneath the diaphragm. It measures transversely from 10 to 12 inches, antero-posteriorly from 6 to 7, and about 3/4 at its thickest posterior portion; it weighs from 90 to 100 ounces and is of a reddish-brown color. Its upper surface is convex, following the curvature of the lower surface of the diaphragm, the lower being concave and broken by its divisions into lobes. The posterior edge is rounded and thick, the anterior thin and sharp. It is divided into the left, right, caudate, and quadrate lobes and the lobe of Spiegelius, is indented by the transverse and longitudinal fissures, and by the fissures for the ductus venosus, the gall-bladder, and the vena cava; it is held in position by the coronary, right and left lateral, falciform, and round ligaments. It is covered by the peritoneum, beneath which is a thin fibrous layer continuous with the capsule of Glisson and the areolar tissue separating the lobules. Its substance is made up of the hepatic lobules united by connective tissue and ramifications of the portal vein, hepatic artery, ducts and veins, and the lymphatic nerves and lymphatics. [A: L.] 2. In addition to the fatty deposits normally found in the cells contiguous to the portal veinlets and at the periphery of the acini, further accumulations are found within the acini, often extending inward as far as the central vein. The l. cells become degenerated and consequently unable to perform their function. The condition tends to become permanent, thus differing from a physiological infiltration of fat. LOBULE, n. Lo'b'u'l. Lat., lobulus (from λοβός, a lobe). Fr., l. Ger., Läppchen. It., lobulo. Sp., lóbulo. 1. A lobelet or small lobe; in the brain, a convolution. Cf. ACINUS. 2. Of Mirbel, a small fleshy body, as in the embryo of wheat and oats, developed on the side opposite to the cotyledon; of some authors, the smaller cotyledon in embryos with cotyledons unequal. [B, 1, 19, 123 (a, 35).]—Cuneate l. (of the cerebrum). Lat., lobulus (cerebri) cuneatus (seu cuneus). Fr., l. cunéiforme. See CUNEUS (2d def.).—Fat l's. Fr., l's adipeux (ou grasseux). Ger., Fettgewebsläppchen, Fettklümpchen, Fettläppchen, Fetttrübchen, Fettzellgruppen.

Clusters of fat cells, each cluster being somewhat isolated from the others by connective tissue and blood-vessels. The l's are connected, forming lobes and sometimes larger masses. Solid masses, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{3}$ of an inch in diameter, of the shape of polyedral compressed sphenoids, separated from each other by connective tissue. Each rests by a flattened base upon a branch of the hepatic vein, the sublobular vein, into which a small twig, the intralobular vein, which penetrates the l., empties. In the interior of the l. are the hepatic cells, between which are the bile capillaries, which anastomose freely with each other; branches of the portal vein, which unite with the capillary terminations of the intralobular vein; and a few capillaries from the hepatic artery, which unite with the capillaries of the intralobular hepatic and portal veins. It is divided into the supramarginal and angular convolutions, and is connected with the occipital lobe by several annectant gyri. Lupine or white lupine; an annual species, probably of Egyptian or east Mediterranean origin. It contains a poisonous uncrystallizable alkaloid (see LUPININE (2d and 3d defs.)), producing paralysis of the nervous trunks and centres with symptoms somewhat analogous to those produced by atropine, but without the delirium of the latter or the spots on the skin indicative of vaso-motor paralysis, and with less pronounced mydriasis. The seeds, semina lupini (seu lupinorum, seu lupinorum sativorum), faba fevilnea (seu lupini), are poisonous in the raw state, but, when they are boiled, the poisonous property is removed, and they were used as food by the ancients. Bruised and soaked in water, they have been employed internally as diuretic and emmenagogue, and especially as anthelmintic, and externally as an application to wounds, ulcers, and swollen glands, and in various cutaneous complaints. Willani*, a neoplastic disease of the skin that begins commonly in early life, pursues a very protracted course, and is attended with destruction of tissues. A cellular new growth, of the nature of graunuloma, takes place in the corium and sometimes also in the mucous membrane, as of the mouth, throat, nose, etc., giving rise to macules, papules, tubercles, or nodules of the surface, which tend to undergo degeneration followed by atrophy of the skin with desquamation of the epidermis or by ulceration with formation of cicatrices. According to its varying clinical features, different varieties of the disease have been described. [G.]—Aceneiform l. Fr., l. acnéique. Occasionally little pits are left behind. [Crocker, "Lancet," July 13, 1878 (G).]—Cancer l. L. associated with epithelioma. Erythematous l., a superficial inflammatory affection of the skin characterized usually by very slow development and by the production of atrophy or cicatrization without ulceration. The disease commonly occurs in patches of various shapes and extent upon which the surface is red, congested, and scaly, while the centre of each patch tends to become slightly depressed, whitish, and atrophic. In the region of sebaceous glands the scales are of a greasy character, and are provided with little prolongations that dip down into the orifices of the dilated follicles. Where the follicles have undergone atrophy or in situations, as upon the palms, where they are absent, the scales are thin, dry, and adherent. When occurring on the face, it frequently spreads in the form of two large patches, one on each cheek, united by a narrow patch passing over the nose, the whole resembling a butterfly in shape. A severe or malignant form of l. erythematosus, first described by Kaposi, in which more or less numerous efflorescences, either disseminated over the cutaneous surface or aggregated in patches, occur about the head, hands, and feet, sometimes also upon the limbs and trunk. The eruption, which may be more or less acute in its development, is attended with fever and with pains in the head, bones, and joints. MAGNESIA (Lat.), n. f. Ma²g(ma²g)-ne(na²)zi²(si²)a². Gr., μάγνησια (from μάγνης, a magnet). Fr., magésie. Ger., Bittererde, M. It., Sp., m. Originally, black oxide of manganese, so called from confusion with magnetic iron ore. This was subsequently called m. nigra, and the term m. alba was given to what is now known as magnesium carbonate. When the metallic elements existing in these two bodies were isolated, the metal of the m. nigra was called manganese, to distinguish it from that of the m. alba, and the term m. nigra was dropped as being no longer in accordance with the changed nomenclature. As at present used, the word m. signifies magnesium oxide, MgO. This substance is a fine, light micro-crystalline or amorphous powder, obtained by the calcination of magnesium carbonate; it is odorless, has a slightly alkaline taste, and shows a faint alkaline reaction when moistened; it is insoluble in alcohol and only slightly soluble in water. When heated to a very high point it fuses, and on cooling solidifies into a hard, vitreous mass. It is also obtainable in a crystalline form. When occurring in the form of powder it is designated, according to its density, light m. and heavy m. The m. of the U. S. Ph. im-levis [Br. Ph.], m. calcinata [Belg. Ph., Roum. Ph.], m. usta [Ger. Ph., Russ. Ph., Roum. Ph., Gr. Ph.], magnesium oxidatum [Aust. Ph., Swiss Ph., Hung. Ph.], oxidum magnesium [Finn. Ph.], lève [Swed. Ph.], oxydum calcicium [Netherl. Ph.], lève [Dan. Ph., Norw. Ph.], magnésie calcinée [Fr. Cod.], oxidum magnésico [Sp. Ph.] is light m., a light powder, white and fine, devoid of odor and having an earthy taste. The m. of the Br. Ph. is heavy m. (the m. ponderosa of the U. S. Ph.). [B, 3, 5, B, 95 (a, 38).] In the dual system of nomenclature of salts, the compounds of magnesium are designated as salts of m. and are regarded as the result of the direct combination of the basic m., or magnesium oxide, with an acid principle. Thus magnesium sulphate, MgSO₄, is considered as compounded of MgO and the radicle SO₄ from sulphuric acid, and is therefore called m. sulphate. It is a kind of psoriasis, and appears under the form of small, gradually increasing, hard and generally rough spots of four different colors, of which the black and blue varieties are counted as epidermic, while the red and white spots are subepidermic and are accompanied by deep-seated lesions of the skin. The disease is most frequent in the States of Michoacán and Guerrero, where it is even considered a mark of distinction by the afflicted persons, and is said to have prevailed extensively after the eruption of the newly formed volcano Jorullo in 1759, but it was known in a sporadic form at the time of the conquest by Cortés. Although the spots are apt to appear on the whole body, they are more frequent on the face, thorax, arms, and hands, but seldom invade both sides of the body in a uniform manner. They show a slight elevation at the borders with gradually increasing desquamation, and are sometimes dry and at others humid and glutinous to the touch. In the earlier stages the disease is said to be curable; in the later stages it is incurable, although seldom fatal. Opinions are divided about its contagiousness, but it doubtless is hereditary. MALIC ACID, n. Mal^2k . Fr., acide malique. Ger., Aepfelsäure. Syn.: hydroxysuccinic acid. A dibasic acid, $\text{C}_4\text{H}_4\text{O}_5 = \text{CH}_2\text{C}(\text{OH})_2\text{CO}_2\text{H}$ forming four-sided shining acicular crystals, or crystals of cauliflower appearance, or bushy or nodular masses. There are two isomeric varieties: (1) Natural or optically active m. a., which occurs in many acid vegetable juices, as those of sour apples, unripe grapes, quinces, etc. Its dilute solution rotates the plane of polarization to the left; if the solution contains 34 per cent. of acid, it becomes inactive: a stronger solution deviates the plane of polarization to the right. A solution containing 60 per cent. of acid thus deviates the plane to the right as much as one containing 86 per cent. does to the left. (2) Inactive or artificial m. a., prepared artificially from succinic acid. It has no effect on the polarized beam. M. a. has a strong but pleasant acid taste, is very soluble in water, and melts at about 100°C .
